The Naked Mind

Mon 10:00-10:30 p.m., 9 Sep-7 Oct 1974

This series of four, half-hour programs was derived from a single one hour show, also called The Naked Mind, broadcast in May 1973. To examine emotional disturbances, the show combined extracts from plays that illustrated the problem with commentary by four guest panelists and a psychologist or sociologist. The production employed a number of Canada's most accomplished players from the Stratford and Shaw Festivals, the Neptune Theatre, the New Brunswick Players, and the Charlottetown Festival to act the scenes. They included William Hutt, Frances Hyland, Eric House, Ted Follows, Nuala Fitzgerald, Bill Hosie, Amanda Hancox, Gracie Finley, William Needles, and Kenneth Pogue, who performed passages from such plays as My Fair Lady, The Devil's Disciple, Saint Joan, Harvey, The Four Poster, Johnny Belinda, and Anne of Green Gables.

Professionals who acted as onscreen consultants included Margery King of the Canadian Council on Children and Youth in Toronto, Wally Mealeia of Dalhousie University, and the Reverend Andrew Hogan, a sociologist and Member of Parliament. For each program, three panelists were chosen from among Donald Cameron and Judy LaMarsh, both writers and broadcasters; actors Barbara Hamilton, William Hutt, and Gale Garnett; producer Jack McAndrew; and the artistic directors of the Stratford and Shaw Festivals, Jean Gascon and Paxton Whitehead, respectively. They joined humorist Henry Morgan, who appeared on all four broadcasts. Live audiences attended the tapings, two of which occurred in Toronto and two in Halifax. Lorraine Thomson hosted The Naked Mind, and Garth Price produced.

characters and required the crew to travel to more than twenty locations across the country.

Sponsored by Royal Trust, the initial run of the series attracted the biggest ratings for any dramatic program in CBC history to that date, an estimated audience of over three million, and a revised version of the series was sold to the BBC. A Canadian history produced essentially for a Canadian audiences, The National Dream met a cultural need and proved a success. Nevertheless, it also demonstrated the typical CBC ambivalence over entertainment and education. Although the story of the politics and machinations behind the construction of the CPR in themselves comprised a drama of value, the series was also made with subsequent classroom use in mind.

In the first episode, The Great Lone Land, Prime Minister John A. Macdonald introduced the promise of a railway to the Pacific through the 1871 Speech from the Throne, and the second episode took the story of the CPR up to 1873. Titled The Pacific Scandal, it centred on charges that the Conservatives had compromised the government for political advantage in its alliance with financier Sir Hugh Allan. The drama climaxed with Macdonald's defence in the House of Commons, but ended with his resignation and the assumption of power by Liberal Alexander Mackenzie. The Horrid B.C. Business, the third episode, traced the staggering progress of the railway, with conflicts between B.C. and the Canadian government and among the surveyors planning the route, through the years of the Mackenzie government. Returned to power in 1878, Macdonald continued to argue the railway in the House, and in The Great Debate, episode four, pushed the required legislation through Parliament. The Railway General, the fifth segment, concentrated on the rapid progress of construction on the prairies in 1882 and 1883 and the development of western Canada under the influence of the CPR's general manager, William Cornelius Van Horne. In the sixth episode, The Sea Of Mountains, however, the construction crews' progress was slowed by the Rockies. The drama concentrated on contractor Andrew Onderdonk, who imported thousands of workers from China to make a path through the mountains, and the engineer Major A. B. Rogers, who located the pass through the Selkirks that now bears his name. In the latter days of construction in the mountains and north of Lake Superior, outlined in episode seven, The Desperate Days, Macdonald was also faced with bloody rebellion by the farmers, natives and Metis in the west. Over this segment and the last, titled The Last Spike, the CPR faced labour unrest and financial ruin until it was saved by a government loan and the railway completed in 1885.

The production assembled an admirable collection of Canada's male character actors to play the politicians, engineers, financiers, and workers responsible for the railway. The two principals were William Hutt as John A. Macdonald and John Colicos as Van Horne. Others included Gillie Fenwick as Alexander Mackenzie; Joseph Shaw, Chris Wiggins, and Gerard Parkes as, respectively, George Stephen, Donald Smith, and Edward Blake, the members of the financial syndicate behind the C.P.R.; Tony Van Bridge as chief surveyor Sandford Fleming; James B. Douglas as Major A. B. Rogers; Robin Gammell as Walter Moberly; Claude Prefontaine as Georges-Etienne Cartier; Sandy Webster as Marcus Smith; Richard Whelan as George McMullen; Kenneth Pogue as James Hill; Paxton Whitehead as Lord Dufferin; Jonathan Welsh as Albert Rogers; Ted Follows as Charles Tupper; David Schurrman as J. H. E. Secretan; Michael J. Reynolds as Andrew Onderdonk; John Horton as Lucius Seth Huntington; and Henry Stamper as Hugh Allan. The only main female role was Agnes Macdonald, played by Pat Galloway. Some of the supporting players included Lloyd Berry as Miller; Vernon Chapman as Richard Cartwright; George Chow as Chen; Joe Crowfoot as the native chief Crowfoot; Neil Dainard as Robert Rylatt; Jim Henshaw as Wilcox; Robert Joy as Carter; Jean Marie Lemieux as Father Lacombe; Don McManus as General Lafayette Rosser; Peter Mews as John Henry Pope; Diana Barrington as Lady Dufferin; Susan Bird as Mary Macdonald; and Tim Crighton as William Topley.

The Nation's Business started in the spring of 1956 as a ten minute, free time political television broadcast, a service already offered on CBC radio. It ran every other week, and alternated with The Rhythm Pals. In the autumn, it expanded to a quarter hour, and alternated with a broadcast of similar format devoted to the politics of the provinces. The alternating pattern of The Nation's Business and Provincial Affairs (q.v.) has continued, although the programs were cut back to slots five to seven minutes in length. In the first few years, the national broadcasts also alternated between English and French language addresses.

Prime Ministers, Cabinet Ministers, party leaders, and senior Members of Parliament used the forum to speak on current issues. Broadcast times were allocated in agreement with the political parties, in the same proportion as the radio broadcasts. The programs originated in Ottawa, and were broadcast, directly wherever possible, by CBC stations and affiliates.

The first producer of the program was Michael Hind-Smith. He was succeeded in 1960 by Lewis Miller. Subsequent producers included Jim Taylor (1964- 66), Bernard Austric (1966-68), Gordon Cullingham (1969-71), Del McKenzie (1976-77), Nancy McLarty (1979-80), and Brian Frappier (1980-date).

humans, was repeated in its entirety in the 1969 season. Other series programming broadcast under the Nature Of Things title included Galapagos, on the life and work of Charles Darwin and the ecology of the Galapagos Islands, written by Sinclair and Livingston; Machines And Man, in the 1968 season, with programs written by Raoul Engel, David Fulton, Roman Bittman, William Whitehead, and Jack Hutchinson; and The Ages Of Man, from the 1969 season, on developments in Canadian medical research, written by Michael Hastings, David Fulton, Bruce Martin, and Lloyd Mayeda, and produced by James Murray and Milo Chvostek.

Murray was the show's executive producer from 1969 to 1972 and again, starting in 1979. Nancy Archibald worked in that capacity from 1972 to 1979. Producers who followed Murray included Milo Chvostek, Roman Bittman, Vincent Tovell, Nancy Archibald, Heather Cook, Diederik D'Ailly, John Bassett, David Tucker, Italo Costa, Vishnu Mathur, and Richard Longley.

The most significant change in personnel came in 1980, when the geneticist and television and radio personality Dr. David
