global color line; whiteness; racial contract; disciplinary canon

This volume (re)centers race and racism as a critical and transnational analytical lens. Drawing from W.E.B. Du Bois' 1925 article in Foreign Affairs (originally the Journal of Race Development) which identified racial hierarchy and economic exploitation as being at the heart of international politics, the editors retrace the emergence of the IR field to issues of imperialism and inter-race relations. The text borrows insights from other disciplines where race and race theory figure more prominently. The text is an accessible entry point for both IR students and scholars.

: worldism; intersectionality; relational materialism, postcolonialism

The authors draw on a range of critical social theory to formulate a 'worldist approach' as an emancipatory project. Their approach contends that the contemporary world is constructed and continues to be reconstructed through intense and intimate relations between self and other. The authors make a bold claim that there is a need to interrogate and challenge not only the 'other' but ourselves too.

: historic erasures; IR canon; pedagogy; identity; intellectual racism; archives

Lynch returns to the 'first debate' in IR over realism and liberalism to highlight how racialized international political practices at that moment in time shaped theoretical assumptions, deferrals and absences in ways that have continued to resonate. Lynch argues that international politics has not fully grasped its own moral aporia regarding racialized injustices.

Keywords: race discourses; erasures

This issue of Alternatives seeks to show how questions about race might be taken up in contemporary analyses of international relations. The authors contend race can best be understood as an interrelated set of material, ideological, and epistemological practices. They posit that the primary problem is not that race has been ignored in IR, but that race has been given the epistemological status of silence. Connecting the dynamics of domestic politics to international outcomes, the authors employ a neo-Gramscian lens, utilizing notions such as hegemony and passive revolution to highlight the presence of far-right authoritarian elements within "Western" states that contributed to the construction of the liberal international order. They conclude by identifying important implications of their argument for xiōghg

Keywords Murdered and missing Indigenous women and girls; self determination; human rights

In this article, Kuokkanen applies a gender-based analysis to reveal patriarchal structures complicit in violence against Indigenous women. Arguing that Indigenous self-determination can only be successful when violence against women is addressed, Kuokkanen advocates for a specific human rights framework that simultaneously addresses both issues.

This volume is situated in the discourse on Africa's position in IR. The essays build on Africanist scholarship to present new research problems and puzzles relevant to understanding Africa in the twenty-first century. The contributors take as their point of departure the inadequacy of analytical tools provided by mainstream IR in capturing and explaining shifting responses on the continent in an emergent geopolitical order.
